Kathleen Peters demands FDEP investigate St. Petersburg's sewer/waste water systems

Over the past three years, the City of St. Petersburg discharged significant amounts of partially treated sewage into the bay's surrounding Pinellas County. St. Petersburg has seen significant growth in population and new business, and the city contracts with several other cities to process sewer/wastewater. With the continued growth in St. Petersburg and the contracted cities, I am concerned St. Petersburg has not maintained and expanded the sewer system infrastructure that protects citizen's health, safety and the environment.

I requested the Florida Department of Environmental Protection investigate and evaluate St. Petersburg's infrastructure and capacity to effectively meet the demands of the city and partnering city's sewer/wastewater demands. This includes looking at protocols on how St. Petersburg responds with their contractual cities for reducing or shutting down the pushing of sanitary waste. I also requested FDEP look into the impact fees for growth and development that have been collected over the past several years to see if those revenues were reinvested to upgrade and improve the infrastructure, as well as review the city's concurrency management system.

Ensuring effective wastewater management systems is absolutely critical to protect the environment, water quality and public health. This is a most fundamental basic need for which the city government is responsible. This week's "weather event" wasn't close to the magnitude of one that occurred last August, when St. Petersburg was reported to have dumped as much as 31 million gallons of partially treated sewer/wastewater into Tampa Bay, Boca Ciega Bay and Clam Bayou.

I have great concern that the increased demand on this system from growth and development together with the city's perceived inaction over the past year to upgrade the wastewater infrastructure has made for a potential environmental and health disaster in the future.
